Virgil Mayor Apostol Paul Kekai Manansala

April 21, 2011

In "Way of the Ancient Healer: Sacred Teachings from the Philippine Ancestral Traditions" (North Atlantic Books, 2010), Paul Manansala talks about the Kapampangan deity, Apo Irung or "Lord of the River."

The buaya ("crocodile" in several Philippine and Indonesian languages) was revered among ancient Filipinos as the embodiment of ancestral spirits. Photo by Amant C. Gonzales.

hood of people revolved around rivers and streams where crocodiles also flourished, a great respect for the creature was instilled in the psyche of the people. Crocodiles were widely venerated, and when fishermen received their first catch, they offered them a panangyutang (food offering). It was considered taboo to harm them.

In Dalupiri, one of the Babuyan Islands off the coast of northern Luzon, it is the belief of the people that because the crocodiles are associated with water, they are also thought to provide water. These people also believed it was a bad omen to capture crocodiles, claiming that whenever this was done, the weather turned bad. Paul Kekai Manansala mentions that in Pampanga the deity Apung Iru, or "Lord of the River," was depicted as a gigantic cosmic crocodile that supported the earth on its back, and was located under the great World River. If angered, Apung Iru caused the rivers to flood; hence, this is the origin of libad or the water procession during the full moon nearest to the summer solstice, which takes place in the yearly celebration called Bayang Dunum (New Water) to appease the deity. The libad is similar to water processions of Vietnam, Thailand, Cambodia, and Indonesia.⁹

A friend once shared with me her dream of a large crocodile that had entered her home. Her reaction was to jump on top of it and stab it with shamanic and spiritual practices and beliefs

Geothermal air conditioning and heating: the Earth "normalizes" air temperatures -- cooling them in summer and warming them in winter.

A heat pump transfers air from the building to an underground receptacle and back. Or you just use a simple piping system like this that uses natural air flow, i.e. hot air rises.
